The Field That Never Forgets

A tale of Kurukshetra-Bhoomi

A tale of Kurukshetraa, born of a battlefield, who fights not with blows but with the hardest questions.

From Hulmane — The Saga

Retold for young readers

Long ago, a great war was fought on the field of Kurukshetra. The soil there still remembers everything.

On a night of fierce lightning, a baby was born right on the battlefield. She did not cry — she gave a battle cry.

As a child, she was digging in the field when her shovel struck something that shouted one word:
“Dharma!”

From the earth she pulled a mighty mace called Bhumi-Garjana. It remembers all that the field has seen.

She grew into Kurukshetraa, a brave warrior woman who could hear the old war's cries in the wind.

An ancient warrior of darkness, Kali-Yoddha, has walked this field for ages. He wished to turn her heart.

He did not attack with weapons. At dawn, beside the shadow of old Bhishma, he asked her hard questions.

So began the Battle of Words. Each morning they argued about right and wrong across the ancient field.

His questions were hard: if that old war was just,
why do the dead still cry? She had no easy answer.

The black francolin birds called the sun up each dawn, while the two of them argued on.

One morning she will answer, or admit she cannot. Until then, the blackbucks watch to see which way the wind of dharma blows.
