A STORY OF BIHAR

The Poet and the Conqueror

A tale of Vajra-Bhumi

The Poet and the Conqueror

A tale of Vajra-Bhumi

A tale of Vajramukha, whose fists carry a warrior's rage and whose heart carries a poet's peace.

From Hulmane — The Saga

Retold for young readers

Vajramukha lives among the old ruins of Bihar.
He is both a mighty fighter and a gentle poet.

When he fights, the rage of the wild gaur bull fills his fists with power.

He wears special gauntlets and wrist-bands.
Each band is written with a line of poetry to calm his anger.

His kind wife Prabhavati waits at home. Once, his rage did not stop in time and hurt her.

Under the old city, a professor found an ancient emperor's war-diary. It filled him with a forgotten rage.

As he read the dark plans, the ground cracked and an old war-pillar rose up from the earth.

The professor and his followers marched on the great library. Vajramukha met them at the door.

For six hours he fought, his fists blazing against the stone pillar. Sparks flew like festival fireworks.

Neither one won, but the library was saved. Blue rollers carried the old manuscripts to safety.

A wise old teacher keeps a secret manuscript. It holds the answer — but only for a reader who is both warrior and poet.

Vajramukha must learn to be both — the charging bull and the calm Buddha — at the very same time.

Over the ruins of Nalanda the rollers fly on. If he can stop punching long enough to read, Bihar may find peace.
