The River's Oath

A tale of Dharmakshetra-Amaravati

A tale of Krishnaveni, the river guardian,
and an enemy who could boil the rivers dry.

From Hulmane — The Saga

Retold for young readers

Krishnaveni is the guardian of the river. Her twin whip-swords dance across the water like lightning.

She protects Amaravati, a beautiful kingdom where water flows through every street.

But far upstream, the river had been taken away.
There the fields were dry and the people were thirsty.

A grieving man named Naraka found a sunken temple full of forbidden magic.

The dark magic changed him into Narakasura, the Blood Emperor. He could boil water with a touch.

He carried a cursed trident. Wherever he planted it, wells and rivers steamed away to nothing.

He boiled a whole fishing fleet in the river.
Krishnaveni knew she had to stop him.

Water fought fire. But when she struck him, his boiling blood cracked the very earth.

A wise blind sage gave her advice: “The river does not fight. The river finds another path.”

So she went deep underground and found hidden rivers that no enemy could reach.

She opened the underground water to the thirsty villages. Springs burst up from the dry earth.

His army left him, for the water had come. In fury, Narakasura pulled fire from the earth's core.

Krishnaveni rose with sacred water that would not burn. This time, she broke his trident.

She did not kill him. She gave him water to drink. “The river does not choose who drinks.”
